Q: Parse.com token update returns unauthorized request Parse.com offers the ability to update an expired token, and I am attempting to implement a token refresh for use in my app. I'm sending the following request: `objectId=&columnName=&columnValue=&expiryTime=` with `expiryTime = 1357892610` I receive the following response: `{"code": 401, "errorType": "Unauthorized"}` The value returned to the application by that request is `"type": "unauthorized_request"`. I'm looking at their guide for updating tokens and it seems that my code matches it perfectly. Does anyone know what might cause this error?

A: You must set parse.com as your client application in the Project Settings.

Social Sharing: In addition to more traditional social sharing links like Facebook, Twitter, and Google+ posts, Evernote now offers an improved LinkedIn function that will automatically create a new note when you attach a LinkedIn profile page. It's a neat idea, but in our test it wasn't quite seamless or fast enough to make us think it would be a common way to pass on an update. That said, we've seen less than a handful of people use it yet. (See When to Share on LinkedIn, When Not to)

Search: With Evernote available across phones, tablets, and computers, you can search within your notes from anywhere. But it doesn't always work so well. Say you're typing a note about a house you bought a few months ago. You may search for the house's address, but even if you find it, you'll be given no clue what the house is used for. (See How to Perform Better Searches in Evernote.) “The features Evernote included on the day it launched were a lot more limited than those in third-party competitors like OneNote,” says Lidov. “Today's version of
